

Selling out the V4

Opposition politicians, analysts, journalists and cultural giants have the worst possible opinion of PM Andrej Babiš and don't even believe him when he bids them "good day." He was willing to sell out his own children to make a fast buck in the Stork's Nest scam, they argue, and he takes no prisoners in running ANO as his own personal power center. If he's loyal to Miloš Zeman, they add, it's only because a presidential pardon might serve him well. Yet when it comes to evaluating yesterday's nomination of Věra Jourová as VP of the EU Commission and commissioner for the rule of law, these same critics cast aside any aspersions of self-dealing and chalk up the weak portfolio to failed good intentions on the part of this supposedly skillful negotiator. We're only surmising, but what if Babiš was telling the truth yesterday, and things really did work out just as he was hoping? What if he agreed with Angela Merkel, Emmanuel Macron and Ursula von der Leyen to use Jourová to bring Visegrád into line, in exchange for immunity for his own sins? In the eyes of his critics, wouldn't that in fact be typical Babiš?
