Family values

Comparisons of Václav Klaus and Eliot Spitzer were inevitable. They both have strong opinions and share a predilection for meeting with young women in hotel rooms. Spitzer is a self-righteous moralizer who was caught breaking his own espoused ethical code. Likewise, when Klaus talks about Christian values and the importance of the family but then runs around on poor Livia, a degree of hypocrisy is evident. But Klaus's statements are missing Spitzer's moralizing. Instead, there seems to be a deeper acceptance on Klaus's part that beyond our innate human condition or frailties, there's the overriding obligation to procreate. So no matter if we are skirt-chasing politicians, confirmed homosexuals, nymphomaniacs with an eye for the gardener, or cheated-on spouses, it's human to let nature take its course, as long as we remember our main task of creating and maintaining a family.
