

What Klaus didn't say

"Fellow citizens,

As the unions initiate their strike today, I call on each of you to look around. Is there a crisis in this country? Are the international agencies slashing our credit rating? Are people sneaking their crowns over the border for fear of exchange controls? Is the unemployment rate approaching 20%? No. Anyone who takes a calm, sober glance around will judge that there is no reason to organize a strike. At the same time, we must accept that we are part of a Europe that is facing some of the very problems of which I speak. We, the politicians and people of Europe, must accept that we have fundamentally failed to grasp to what degree our actions of the past are now threatening our future. While I disagree with today's strike, I fully respect the right of the people to demonstrate their dissatisfaction with the current course of events."
