Crisis? Whose crisis?

If there is no such thing as a coincidence, as fictional homicide detective Harry Bosch is wont to say, how should we view the fact that the very same Ladislav Bátorá who incited the latest Czech cabinet crisis is the one who also predicted that Václav Klaus will soon launch a new political party? Or that the flames of crisis were fanned by the same Miroslav Kalousek who has perhaps the best chance of becoming the next Czech PM, should the Nečas government fall? Or that the crisis coincided with a devastating leak from within ODS about how poorly Petr Nečas is guiding his party into the regional elections? Is it conceivable that Klaus would try to solder together a new political party from scraps of ODS and VV and, in one fell swoop, gain representation for it in both Parliament and the cabinet? It's too early to say, but this could realistically be one of the 28 chess games the Professor is playing.
