Klaus and the big bang

As a publication that has warned repeatedly about the end of Euro-American civilization, we were interested to see Václav Klaus take up the issue in Právo. This is one of his most important interviews ever, not only because he chooses the direst issue of our time, but also because he indirectly makes the case for why he should be in charge when the big bang comes (he calls it an "absolute collision"). By laying out the facts, he has done what no other Czech politician has dared to do, other than Miloš Zeman to a lesser degree. It's striking that Klaus resorts partially to Havelism to make his point - by criticizing the consumer society. It's also worrisome that he omits one of the biggest causes of our civilization's self-destruction, namely the globalization of corruption (which he has been a party to). Any Czechs who don't want Klaus as their future dictator should quickly start grooming someone else.
