Liar, liar, pants on fire!

Millions of people enjoy watching reality shows, but for the intelligent minority, they serve only one purpose - to prove once again how vulgar and simple the human race can be. And in this very sense, the Vít Bárta "reality show" (to borrow Václav Klaus's expression for it) is very instructive. It's very useful to see just how vulgar and simple Czech politicians can be. It's also immensely helpful to see that Czech politicians lie as well under oath before a judge as they do before a voter. Without hard, physical evidence for establishing innocence or guilt, there really is no other reason to bring such professional con men (and women) into a courtroom, because the judges will merely be forced to choose in this "he said, she said" trial between the poker-faced lying type and the hysterical crybaby version. And if in the end the judges are able to convict someone on the basis of all this prevarication, we'll know they're lying too.
