Janoušek's secret powwow

Roman Janoušek used all those crime-scene phone calls to summon his team for a brainstorming session late Fri. afternoon. The mission: Find a way to keep him from going to the slammer for 10 years. As Janoušek slept off his hangover and coke-induced high in the corner, one of his lawyers took control. "What about his car? Can we get someone to swear that it lurched like a Toyota and ran that woman over all by itself? Or maybe we spread the rumor that it was all a setup. Someone knocked him out with Rohypnol, ran a beer funnel down his throat and let him loose on the D1. No, too lame. We need something so ponderous that no one can dispute it. Maybe something connected to national security. How about this? Wiretaps are a threat to democracy, and Romeš was so worried about the fate of the nation that he had a few too many. It's not perfect, but it should be mitigating enough for a suspended sentence under § 41d. Give this one to Klaus. You'll find him at that Natland event in Špindler tomorrow night."
