

Peake without money

Starting a new political party is a financial nightmare, esp. if you don't have the likes of Vít Bárta, Tomáš Hrdlička, Roman Janoušek, Richard Háva or Zdeněk Bakala helping to foot the bill. Karolína Peake is promising to have an absolutely transparent party, which would be nearly a historic first in Czech politics. Such a strict credo would mean changing the way VV does things at the ŘSD highway department. It would also mean forgetting about tapping the meal-voucher industry again (or should we say squeezing?). To get an idea of what political life without money is like, Peake's budding party could look to Jiří Paroubek's Left 21. It launched a clever ad campaign but has too little money to make a real dent, now that Hrdlička and Janoušek have reportedly written Paroubek off. If Peake wants a clean party, it's only future might lie in forcing all the other parties to come clean too. Since that is unlikely, the cleverest Peakers will start looking for ways to become useful to ODS, TOP 09 or ČSSD, even as they found their new party.
