Career guidance for ODS wunderkinder

Opportunities are opening up for a new breed of manager. Gone are the days when a promising young managing director or even partner in an important foreign company leaves for the Czech public sector because of the once-in-a-lifetime chance to "make a stealing" without the slightest risk of going to prison. No names will be mentioned, but Martin Dvořák and Petr Žaluda come to mind. No longer shall a headhunter devoid of talent but full of connections charge high fees for placing people whose specialties are playing golf and playing it fast and loose with the rules. The public sector - DPP, for example - now demands a new kind of wunderkind. He or she must be the product of a real "tender" and know how to order forensic audits and speak platitudes to transparency and fair play. But under no circumstances - none - shall he or she actually return to anything that transpired in the past.
