Miloš Zeman's Wild West show

Miloš Zeman went West yesterday with guns a'blazing. His stagecoach stopped in Washington, where a crowd had gathered to cheer as one vaudevillian after another celebrated his love for and devotion to the Holy Land and its Likud party. Zeman declared that we are all Jews now and set himself apart from the others even more by being the slowest to take the stage, the slowest to speak and the one with the biggest six-shooters. Drone 'em to death, he exhorted, as if robotic birds in the sky were the new Gatling guns that would wipe out the Indians (er, terrorists). In the spirit of Wild West shows, Zeman was there to be adored and not to offend, except for maybe the local sheriff over in the White House. "No more of your go-it-alone occupational wars," Zeman stammered. As his stagecoach rolled off into the sunset, the sheriff's deputies could be heard muttering, "Good riddance, and never come back to this town again."
