

Operation Delta

War propaganda conducted over a number of years with the goal of convincing a reluctant population of the need of foreign engagement follows a standard format. It builds gradually and culminates with an outrageous act by the enemy that allows the government to make its case before the people. In contrast, war propaganda compressed into a period of just one or two years is best when conducted in ebbs and flows, with brief setbacks followed by partial successes, in a repeated pattern. On the Czech level, the Global War on Covid-19 is now in a lull, something like a summer armistice. Businesses are open, children are back in school, and people are having fun again. In the euphoria, little is being done to take effective precautions against another attack. Yet the war machine is already gearing up for Operation Delta against its own people, with predictable repercussions. Predictable, that is, for those who see the pattern and have a sense of the motivations behind it.
